

Where Correctness Flunked Out

December 23, 1995

Influential college alumni who've been fuming about thier old school's emphasis on political correctness found a place to vent earlier this month. The National Alumni Forum, an organization of celebrity alumni and college trustees, shmoozed with fat cats at a Washington conference on "Excellence in Higher Education: How Donors Can Make a Difference" designed to avery such embarrassing episodes as Yale University's return of a $20 million gift ties to studies of Western civilization.

"This may be the beginning of the GOPAC of higher education," a spokesman for a university organization quipped.
